The ISPAC International Conference of 2014 will be focused on the growing involvement of organized crime and corrupt actors in the sports industry at national and global level. The Conference is addressed to international organizations, law enforcement agencies, academic and cultural institutions and other private stakeholders (i.e. event organisers, infrastructure owners, sport associations, leagues and clubs) concerned with the counteraction to this criminal phenomenon and maintains continuity with the ISPAC activities to support forms of intergovernmental cooperation against organized crime and corruption. In many ways, sports organizations and events have become permissive environments for organized crime and corruption. In particular, preparations of great sporting events in the last years have called the attention to organized criminal activities such as illicit financial flows and money laundering, match-fixing, contract fraud, corruption, and human trafficking. The demand to preserve the integrity of professional sport against these threats was highlighted in the recent World Sport Ministers Conference co-organized by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). This need of preservation surfaces also in the amount of scientific reports and documents adopted by national and international institutions, including the United Nations.

Match-fixing is one of the most common pathways for criminal and corrupt involvement in sports. The Council of Europe's Conference of Ministers Responsible for Sport, in March 2012, invited EPAS (European Partial Agreement on Sport) to launch negotiations, in coordination with the European Union, on a possible international legal instrument (Convention) against the manipulation of sporting events results, followed in June 2013 by the authorisation given to the EU Commission by the Council to participate, on behalf of the Union, in these negotiations (from September 2011 to February 2012, a deep comparative study on criminal law and match-fixing has been carried out for the European Commission by KEA (European Affairs)). In this context, important efforts aimed at understanding and preventing match-fixing have been made by several non-governmental organizations (i.e. Sport-Accord, Eucrim, International Centre for Sports Security, Transparency International) and by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), which commissioned and supervised a study on criminalization approaches to combat match-fixing and the illegal/irregular betting that drives it.

In the same Conference of March 2012, the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe also invited the European Committee on Crime Problems (CDPC), in co-operation with the Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) and EPAS, to consider the feasibility of an Additional Protocol to the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption, which could expand the scope of application of its provisions to the private non-profit sector, notably the sporting sector. Even in this field, an important role is played by the UNODC, which has developed (guided by the principles in the United Nations Convention against Corruption) a handbook featuring a set of practical measures designed to counter the threat of corruption in the high-risk environment created by the organization of a major public event.

More in general, the problem of the infiltration of organized crime in sports ó which encompasses illicit financial flows and money laundering, referred to by the Financial Action Task Force (FATF) ó was analysed in the workshop organized by the U.S. Department of State and INTERPOL in the scope of the International Anti-Corruption Conference (IACC), which took place in Brasilia in November 2012. Furthermore, recent scandals and reports (such as the Australian Crime Commission investigation into organised crime and drugs) have also highlighted the emerging connections between organized crimes and doping, which has become a business for the crime industry. In this context, considering that major events expose host countries to increased organized crime activity (e.g. fraud, bribery, human trafficking) but may also increase resources for law enforcement agencies, the UN Interregional Crime and Justice Research Institute (UNICRI), in addition to INTERPOL's Integrity in Sport Unit and numerous private entities, provide assistance to host countries on how to deal with the challenges presented by this scenario since the launch of the Programme on Major Events Security in 2002 (backed by the UN ECOSOC Resolution 2006/28).

Given this background, the expected outcome of the ISPAC International Conference of 2014 would be the definition of steps that key stakeholders should take to combat organized crime and related corruption in sports at the national and international level. In particular, the main purpose is to outline the importance of international cooperation (sharing of information, monitoring of criminal activities in sports industry) and to suggest strategies of prevention and information. This approach should help national institutions to identify the main deficiencies in their preventive strategies and enable the development of best practices and tools to combat the involvement of organized crime in the sports industry. The role of criminal law towards sport jurisdiction and other preventive tools should also be pointed out. Considering that to this end an essential role could be played by international legal instruments, one of the main goals of the Conference is to examine the current development of such instruments among the various international organizations and, where appropriate, lay the foundations for the consideration of documents by the United Nations bodies that may be involved, notably the UNODC.

In this view, each session will be dedicated to the above-mentioned expressions of organized crime in sports industry. Expert panelists will identify the most high-risk sports and types of crime associated with them, present case studies on organized crime in sporting events and examine the international regulatory framework. Panelists will also be asked to point out concrete solutions and effective tools to organize a better response to organized crime and strengthen the integrity of sports and major sporting events.
